The adoption of the Sustainable Development Goals was accompanied by a sense of urgency for the universal achievement of social justice, inclusive governance, shared prosperity and environmental conservation.

The world's governments, drawing inspiration and direction from their populations and civil society organizations committed to leaving no one behind. It is a commitment that is also encapsulated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is a commitment contained in human rights treaties and in particular in the Women's Convention.

Yet, many women and girls have been left behind, marginalised by patriarchal systems of entitlement and intersecting discriminations and bases of exclusions - whether income, geography, disability, race, ethnicity or sexual orientation. And women remain outside of governance, their perspectives and interests largely unheard.

Nothing for us, without us! All of UN Women's work is founded on the recognition of women's agency; of their demand and expectation to participate in and benefit from political and economic decision making. Facilitating women's voice is therefore both a means and an ends of our work. In this, UN Women must work with women's movement, understanding that one indicator of sustained and implemented social policy progress is a vibrant and independent women's movement.

And so in 2015, across the 22 countries in the Asia-Pacific region where UN Women has programme presence, partnerships with ministries for gender equality, women's organisations, UN agencies and developmental agencies have shaped our work on economic empowerment, ending violence against women; addressing harmful practices based on gender stereotypes and advancing peace and security. We know that the scale of social norms change needed can only come about with whole of society commitments, including through work with faith institutions, media, the private sector, trade unions, civil society, popular culture movements and human rights organizations. And given the work on ending patriarchy, UN Women, through the HeforShe campaign, has expanded our work with men who understand their own obligations and accountability to reject patriarchal entitlement and to model equality, whether in the home, community or workplace.

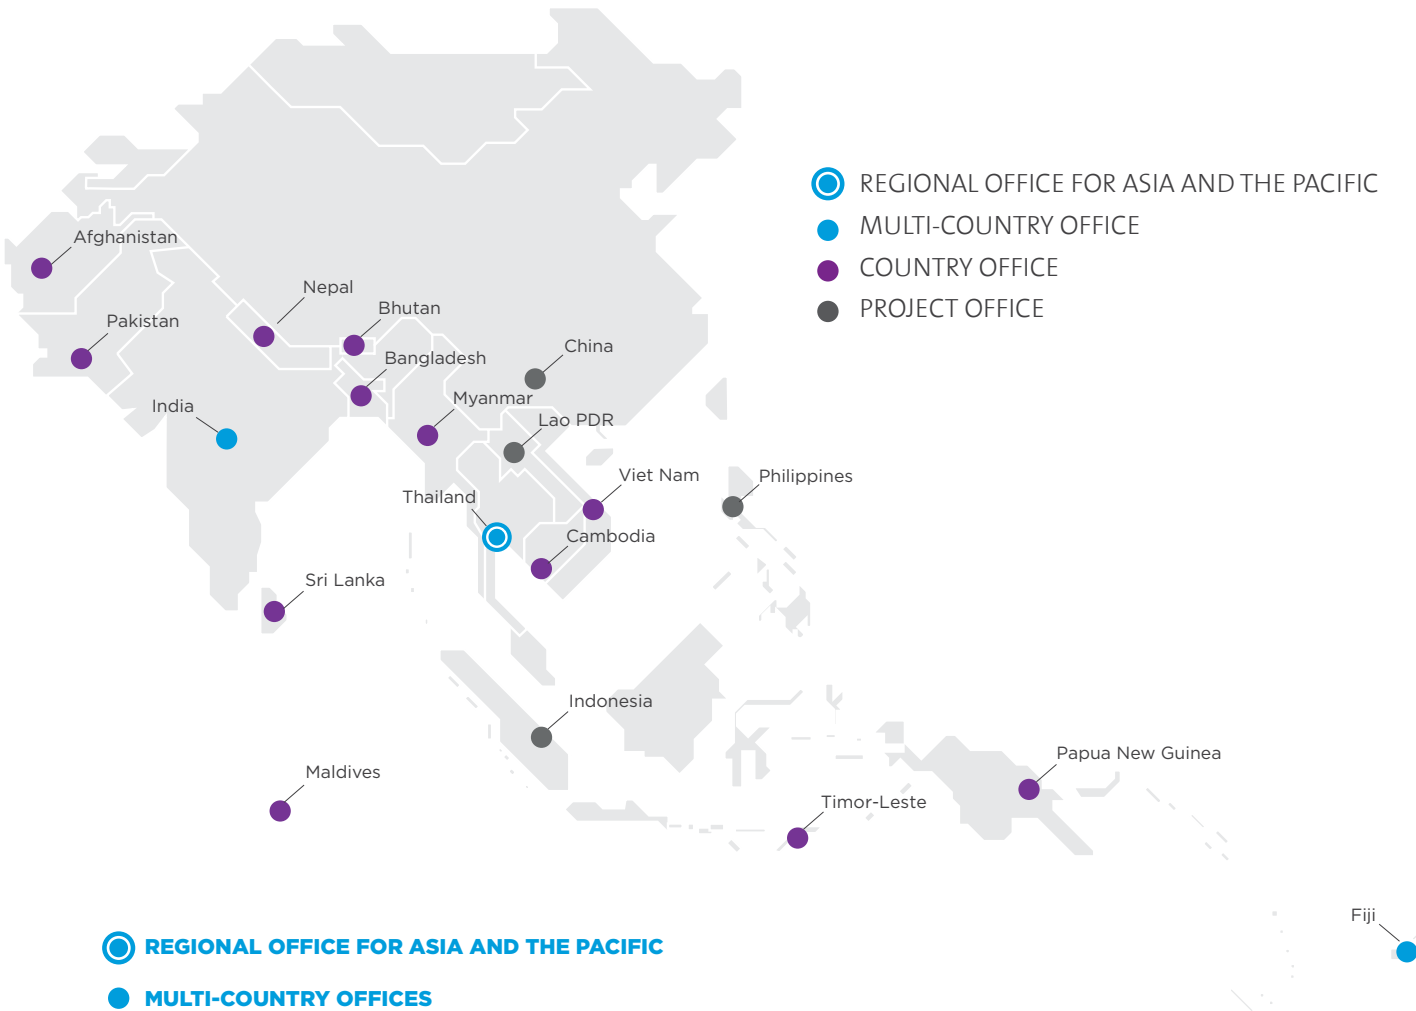

For UN Women, we see the adoption of Sustainable Development Goal 5 and gender targets, not only as a reaffirmation of the values which the world needs but also central to the solutions to inequalities, extremism and climate change.

This Annual Report captures some of the work which we undertook in the Asia-Pacific region, in collaboration with governments, the UN system, development partners and civil society actors. It is an interactive report through which you will have access to our reports, advocacy tools and publications. We invite you to use these materials!

Stepping Up Action and Accountability

Galvanizing Action on Gender Equality

In 2015 Asia-Pacific governments reaffirmed their commitment to accelerate the implementation of foundational commitments including the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action of 1995 and the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW).

Member States also adopted new commitments under Sustainable Development Goals including Goal 5 - Achieve Gender Equality and Empower all Women and Girls.

Renewed political will was also apparent in the unprecedented high level attendance by 19 Asia-Pacific Heads of State at the Global Leaders' Meeting on Gender Equality and Women's Empowerment, co-organized by UN Women and the Government of the People's Republic of China in New York in September. There, Asia-Pacific leaders committed to specific actions to eliminate violence against women and girls; end child and early marriages; change social norms through the education system; and address unpaid care work through quality child care and paternity leave.
